

12-case

Psychological competence When communicating with their children, parents often compare them with other children. Nina's mother, pleased with her daughter's behavior, often says "You can do everything with me, you are the best," "You are the most beautiful." But Tanya's mother, wanting her daughter to be more organized and develop better, says "All children are like children, only you are abnormal," "Look how smart Katya is. Everything works out for her, but for you..."

- Both mothers wish the best for their children, but which of them will achieve better results in parenting?
- Is there a relationship between the direction of "designing" children's behavior and the personality traits of the mothers themselves?