

5-case

Ethical competence. The teacher invites the student to the board, asks him to turn to face the class (group), and himself, standing to the left of the student, asks him questions. It is assumed that the class (group) is fully interested in listening to the student's answer. Next, the student at the board begins to rush between the need, from an etiquette point of view, to answer the person asking questions and to look at him and at the same time try to look the whole class in the eye. What is incorrectly organized in this learning situation and how should it be corrected?
