

13-case

In modern organizations, the selection of management personnel is increasingly based on the principle of selecting young, active and promising people. Employees of pre-retirement and retirement age naturally have a “fear of competition” and a reluctance to raise a successor. How can a promising employee in such a situation enter the personnel reserve, try to become a successor for his manager, without “hindering” his manager?