From an employee's story: I am a new employee of the department. My only possible mentor behaves in such a way that I not only have a minimum of information about my activities, but also orientation in the production environment as a whole, thanks to the participation of the mentor, becomes extremely difficult. Thus, most of the iceberg of professional knowledge, features and communication opportunities remains inaccessible to me. The mentor reserves the most significant cases in which he can prove himself, since, apparently, he is afraid of competition from me (the mentor's position is slightly higher than mine). The problem is for "competitors" to become like-minded people.
